

Telemarketers should not have the right to call individuals who have elected to be on the Do Not Call List, nor should rules governing the List be weakened. Telephone service is paid for by the consumer, and the consumer should therefore have considerable say in how this service is used or whether it can be infringed upon. The Do Not Call List rightfully gives this control back to the consumer.